Presentation: The Anglophone crisis deep rooted in the All Anglophone Conferences (AACs)

The presenter gets into the present crisis rocking the country as a separatist movement is trying to gain independence for the Anglophone regions. He briefly recounts the history of the country as from the 1950s and the problems that erupted as time went on. This culminated to the 1993 All Anglophone Conference and a subsequent AAC with all recommending greater autonomy and a return to federalism. His analyses highlighted the exploitation and abuse suffered by the minority Anglophones and he says this has caused the precarious situation and the violence witnessed in the Anglophone regions. He examines the present solutions to the problems and questions whether the next AAC that is planned could really solve the Anglophone problem. Discussions focused on areas of possible solutions, on the terminological divide – Francophone/Anglophone and the fragile grasp of the ideology sustaining the raging civil war in the Anglophone regions
